Myles' earliest writings were influenced by the confessional poets of the 1960s, such as Sylvia Plath and Anne Sexton. However, Myles quickly moved beyond the constraints of traditional form and style, experimenting with language, gender identity, and autobiography.

Exploring Gender Identity and Desire

Myles' work is deeply rooted in their own experiences of gender and desire. As a non-binary and queer writer, Myles has challenged the rigid boundaries of gender and sexuality, exploring the fluidity and complexity of human identity.

Myles' writing often blurs the lines between fact and fiction, autobiography and invention. Their characters are often gender-fluid, bisexual, or transgender, reflecting Myles' own exploration of these identities.

The Power of Language and Autobiography

Language is a central theme in Myles' work. Myles experiments with grammar, syntax, and punctuation, creating a lyrical and evocative style that is uniquely their own. Their writing is characterized by a raw and honest voice that captures the complexities of human experience.
