On one side was Reginald Murray, a wealthy Englishman who had come to Australia seeking adventure. On the other was Jack Johnson, a cunning and experienced cattleman who knew the outback like the back of his hand.

The wager was simple: Murray would travel alone through the outback for three months, with no supplies or assistance. If he could survive, he would win a large sum of money. If he failed, he would lose everything.

Murray accepted the challenge, confident in his abilities. He set off into the outback, armed with only a rifle, a compass, and a few basic tools.

At first, Murray thrived in the outback. He hunted for food, found water, and made shelter. But as the days turned into weeks, the harsh conditions began to take their toll.

Murray's supplies dwindled, and he became increasingly exhausted and hungry. He began to doubt his ability to survive.

Meanwhile, Johnson was following Murray's progress from a distance. He knew that Murray was struggling, but he refused to help him. He was determined to win the wager.

As the three months drew to a close, Murray was on the brink of death. He had lost all hope, and he was ready to give up.

But then, something unexpected happened. A group of Aborigines found Murray and nursed him back to health. They gave him food, water, and shelter, and they taught him how to survive in the outback.

With the help of the Aborigines, Murray was able to complete his journey. He returned to Johnson's camp, alive and well.

Johnson was furious that Murray had survived. He refused to pay the wager, and he claimed that Murray had cheated.

But Murray had learned a valuable lesson in the outback. He had learned that courage, resilience, and the help of others can overcome any challenge.

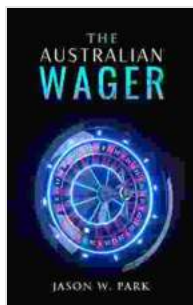

Murray took Johnson to court, and he won the wager. He used the money to help the Aborigines who had saved his life.
