The Development of the Triumph Trident and BSA Rocket

The Triumph Trident and BSA Rocket were developed in the early 1960s as a response to the growing demand for high-performance motorcycles. At the time, British manufacturers were facing stiff competition from Japanese and Italian bikes, and they needed to develop new models that could compete on both performance and price.

The Triumph Trident was the first of the two bikes to be developed. It was based on the Triumph Bonneville, but it featured a number of significant upgrades, including a new frame, suspension, and engine. The BSA Rocket was developed shortly after the Trident, and it shared many of the same design features. However, the Rocket had a slightly different engine and frame, and it was marketed as a more affordable alternative to the Trident.

Production of the Triumph Trident and BSA Rocket

The Triumph Trident and BSA Rocket were produced from 1963 to 1975. During that time, over 70,000 units were produced, making them two of the most popular British motorcycles of the era.

The Trident and Rocket were produced at different factories. The Trident was built at Triumph's factory in Meriden, England, while the Rocket was built at BSA's factory in Small Heath, England.

The Racing Successes of the Triumph Trident and BSA Rocket

The Triumph Trident and BSA Rocket were both successful racing motorcycles. The Trident won the Isle of Man TT in 1966 and 1967, and the Rocket won the TT in 1969. Both bikes also won numerous other races, and they helped to establish Triumph and BSA as two of the leading manufacturers of racing motorcycles.

The racing successes of the Trident and Rocket helped to boost their sales, and they became two of the most popular motorcycles in the world.
