The IWMA was founded by a group of trade unionists, socialists, and anarchists, including Karl Marx, Friedrich Engels, and Mikhail Bakunin. The organization quickly spread to other countries, and by the 1870s it had branches in over 20 countries.

The IWMA played a major role in the development of the international labor movement. It helped to organize workers into trade unions and political parties, and it promoted the idea of international solidarity among workers. The IWMA also helped to spread the ideas of socialism and anarchism among workers around the world.

The IWMA was dissolved in 1876, but its legacy continues to this day. The organization's ideas and principles have inspired generations of workers to fight for their rights.

The International Today

The International is more relevant today than ever before. The global economy has created a new class of workers who are exploited by multinational corporations. These workers are often denied basic rights, such as the right to organize and bargain collectively.

The International can help to unite these workers and fight for their rights. The organization can provide support for workers' struggles around the world, and it can help to build a global movement for workers' liberation.

150 Years of Struggle

The International has been fighting for workers' rights for 150 years. The organization has played a major role in the struggle for the eight-hour day, the minimum wage, and other basic rights. The International has also been at the forefront of the fight against fascism, racism, and other forms of oppression.

The International's 150th anniversary is a time to celebrate the organization's achievements and to recommit to the fight for workers' liberation. The International is a symbol of hope for workers around the world. The organization's struggle for justice and equality will continue for many years to come.

Workers Unite!

The International is a call to action for workers around the world. The organization is a beacon of hope for those who are struggling for a better future. Workers unite!
